Johnson's Handicap

A bunch of ball players the other night were discussing the case of Walter Johnson as a pitcher. All agreed that the Bicade Shrapnel was a pretty fair work man as it was. But it was also agreed that Johnson would be almost unhittable, beyond all range, if he ever adopted the tactics used by most successful slabmen -that is, the policy of shooting a stray shot at the batsman's onion once in a while. This system has kept many pitchers up in the winning ranks, as it has a decided tendency to drive the athlete back from the plate and work upon his nerves. But Johnson never uses it, and mainly for the reason that the batsman would have only an outside chance of ducking the shot as propelled by Walter's arm, and if the shot ever landed squarely Johnson would have the ghost of a dead man stalking his sleep.
